

The Great Work Begins (Normal)

June 22th, 1924

It has begun. Already Richard has entered a fugue state and run off to parts unknown, and Ellis will not be far behind. It is not a great loss for the Society (the two of them were always a bit odd and backwards, after all) but it is troubling nonetheless. When Ellis's hold on sanity finally slips, I shall follow him and write down his travels, taking note of what he stops to pay attention to.

Begin at the Coolidge Corner Library at the front door. Use the nearby crosswalk and then turn left. Walk straight, and then make a non-90-degree right turn when you can, then walk to the end of the block. Turn left and cross Beacon St. Turn left and walk straight.

Keep on going till the end of the block. Turn right at the corner. Walk straight, then take the first right, and then the first right again. Walk straight to the corner.

Use both crosswalks here, and then turn right. Walk straight on and then cross Beacon St. again. Keep going straight for quite a while. Sometime after you cross Shailer St, cross Harvard St at the next light. Then, turn right and head back the way you came, except on the other side of the street.

Walk straight on for a while, then turn left at the Friendly's Express. Walk straight until you can turn right, then do so. Walk straight until you can turn left, then do so. Cross the street again to return to the starting point, which should complete your walking tour.
